

7 Training Tips for a well-behaved Dog

If you have just gotten a new dog, whether it is a puppy or a fully grown adult, it is important to know how to effectively train it. Dogs naturally misbehave by barking at others and can wreak havoc in your home, but it doesn't have to be that way, especially when you take the right approach to training it.

1. Be selective with giving treats

A lot of dog owners give out treats to their pets too much and it can take away from the positive reinforcement that is so important in training them. Make sure to only give your dog a treat when they do something they are supposed to so they have a motivation to do it again in the future.

2. Consistency is key

One of the most important things to do when training a dog is for everyone in the household to be consistent when it comes to praising the dog for good behavior and letting it know when it has done something wrong. When everyone isn't on the same page, it can be confusing for the dog.

3. Manage your expectations

Your dog is an animal and as such it has certain natural instincts and behaviors that take time to change, so it is important that you are realistic with your expectations. A dog cannot be trained overnight, so keep in mind that it will take some time to make progress with it.

4. Knowing when to give your dog its freedom

If you get your dog when it is still a puppy, it is important to slowly give it more freedom to roam around the house outside of the crate. People who refuse to crate their dogs from the beginning usually end up with soiled and destroyed furniture and other ruined possessions, so make sure to ease into giving your dog its full freedom outside of a cage.

5. Be Prepared

It is always a good idea for new dog owners to be prepared and anticipate the destruction and trouble that will occur until training is complete. When you expect that your dog will chew on shoes that are left on the floor and eat food sitting out on countertops, it can be easier to prevent such incidents as well as lessen the frustration that comes with them.

6. Be aware of how your behavior effects your dog

A dog tends to take cues from its owner when it comes to how they behave, so it is important to keep in mind that your behavior can have either a negative or positive effect on it.

7. Make sure your dog isn't worked up before walks

One of the biggest complaints that new dog owners have is getting pulled around on walks, which is something that can usually be corrected by ensuring that the dog isn't too worked up beforehand. When your dog is jumping around and hyperactive just before a walk, they will probably end up walking you instead of the other way around.
